ALAYSIA
Dear Alaysia,

Thank you for promoting the power of a good listener (for you, that was God).

Thank you for your personal wisdom about how to deal with hair loss.

Thank you for including challenging times, like port accesses, IV starts and what to eat when you don’t want to eat, in your story. Your tips and advice will help so many other children.

Surrounding you in hope,
Jenni
Alaysia’s Sand Tray

The angel is for God and His love. I just talk to Him and he says everything is going to be okay.

The girl is in the bed getting her IV because she is sick. She reads books while she is getting an IV.

The mirror is there because the girl looks in the mirror and knows she still has hair. When it starts falling out, she has to get it cut.

I put the food in because sometimes I am not hungry when I have chemo, but sometimes I am and I have chips, hot dogs and goldfish.

The girl has a butterfly (butterfly needle to access her port) to get her medicine. I like them to count so I know when the poke is coming.

The paint is there because the girl can paint at the hospital. She likes to paint animals.

By: Alaysia
Alaysia’s Sand Tray